◆ AI Overview

Pat Buchanan famously used his fiery 1992 Republican National Convention speech to declare a "culture war". In it, he attacked what he called "radical feminism," which he claimed was represented by Hillary Clinton, and the agenda of "abortion on demand, a litmus test for the Supreme Court, homosexual rights, discrimination against religious schools, women in combat units". Bringing Ronald Reagan into discussions about Buchanan and radical feminism is necessary because the two represent contrasting eras of the American conservative movement.

- Reagan's Strategy: The Reagan administration courted suburban and socially conservative voters but also appointed the first woman to the Supreme Court (Sandra Day O'Connor). His political narrative focused heavily on an optimistic, economically focused vision. 🔗
- Buchanan's Shift: As a populist firebrand and speechwriter who occasionally broke with Reagan, Buchanan shifted the GOP heavily toward social identity politics. He rejected mainstream feminism entirely, once remarking that the "real liberators of American women" were not feminists, but "the automobile, the supermarket, the shopping center, the dishwasher".
