What is the 7 minute rule at Harvard?

AI Overview

The "7 minute rule," famously known as "Harvard Time," is an old campus tradition dictating that all classes officially begin seven minutes past the scheduled hour. This grace period was originally designed to give students—who often have back-to-back harvard is a massively aggressive place meaning

- The Harvard Clock: If a class was scheduled for 10:00 AM, the professor wouldn't actually begin lecturing until 10:07 AM.
- Campus Culture: The custom bled into almost all student events, meetings, and extracurriculars, making it perfectly normal to show up "late" to everything by traditional standards. The Harvard Crimson +2

Does it still exist?

Technically, no. The Faculty of Arts and Sciences officially phased out "Harvard Time" in 2018 when they restructured course blocks into 75-minute sessions. The new schedule granted a 15-minute passing time between all classes, making the 7-minute buffer obsolete. However, the concept is still deeply ingrained in campus lore and student habits.
